Propane industry pushes for bigger share of home market

By DAVID BRADLEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

The closest most homeowners come to regular use of propane is when they fire up gas grills.

But the propane industry wouldn't mind if consumers expanded use of the clean burning, nontoxic fuel throughout the house.

Increases in home heating, cooking and fireplaces are all seen as ripe for propane growth.

Home uses already account for more than half of all propane consumption, yet propane suppliers see this as merely a good start.

"I see huge growth potential," says Jim Hitzemann, a sales manager for Ray Murray Inc., a propane provider to eastern U.S. states. "Propane use is still in its infancy. It will only grow as homeowners learn about it."

The U.S. Department of Energy reports more than 6 million homes rely on propane as heating fuel.

Most of the expected growth will come in what Hitzemann calls off line areas, suburban homes away from main natural gas lines.

Until recently, propane users stuck out like sore thumbs. Bulbous 325 to 1,000 gallon tanks were common sights in outlying areas.

However, tanks are now routinely buried below ground. Because propane is nontoxic and nonpoisonous, the gas won't contaminate aquifers or soil.

Propane is stored as a liquid, but it is the vapors in the tank that actually power home appliances.

Homeowners with a 500 gallon tank typically work through more than one tank per year if they use propane heavily.

Factor insurance into your project budget

By DAVID BRADLEY
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Chances are you created a project budget for your remodeling or construction project.

But chances are just as good that you neglected to tack on an extra line item for added insurance.

Your standard homeowners policy probably won't cover every aspect of the project. Most home insurance is intended to protect what's already there, not what you plan to add, improve or renovate.

Lost, damaged or stolen materials will need to be replaced. If you don't take adequate security precautions, portions of a standard policy may be void.

If a worker, neighbor or passerby is injured because of some lapse in the process that could be linked to you, you could be on the wrong end of a legal skirmish.

It will be worth your time to invite your insurance agent for an informal discussion or walk-through of your project intentions. The agent will be able to suggest riders to existing policies that won't cost an arm and a leg. The riders will be for the term of the project itself.

Eric Goldberg, associate general counsel of the American Insurance Association, says not enough homeowners bother to read existing policies to find Short-term riders to homeowners-insurance policies should be considered for many projects, such as the makeover to the front of this home. Insurance protects against liability costs for things such as worker injury or stolen tools.

what it does cover, nor do they talk their plans over with their agent, who can recommend how to fill any gaps in coverage.

Goldberg says homeowners should chiefly be concerned about liability. If any portion of your project would fall over or otherwise cause damage to neighboring property, you could be liable for repairs.

Suggestions can range from roping off excavation holes to secure off-site storage of materials and appliances.

If you live elsewhere during the renovation period, it may be recommended you might hire a drive-by security service to check on the work site during evening hours.

It will be advantageous to document all materials, safety measures and other insurance-related steps you take. Should an unfortunate event occur, you'll need such paperwork and perhaps photographic or video documentation.

So what can you expect to pay for this protection? According to several insurance sources, the cost will vary by the size and scope of project.

Since the coverage is of limited duration, the cost of added coverage could be as little as an additional $200 to a high of about $750.

Location or isolation of your home, availability of street lighting and nearby neighbors who can keep an eye open for suspicious activity are also variables.

On top of liability and theft coverage is a bump in total coverage for your home. Goldberg says that "with the way real estate prices are going, if the improvement increases the overall value of your home, you'll need to be covered."

It can be particularly unfortunate if the house is damaged by fire or storms and you won't receive enough insurance proceeds to rebuild.

Portions of the project will be covered by the policies of your contractor and subcontractors. Sit down with your general contractor for their take on insurance issues.
