NEW MARKET, Va.

Many of the gardeners among us are looking for the perfect tomato, which in the end may be worth more than a precious metal.

"Taste is subjective," said Gary Ibsen, who grows 520 varieties of heirloom tomatoes on three organic certified farms in California.

"I've had people tell me 'The best tasting tomato I ever had was from Uncle Henry's jar in 1946. I've never had anything that good since.' And then they ask me what I can offer. I can't match it," Ibsen said.

"It's a taste etched in someone's emotional memory that will never be replaced. But we can find varieties that are similar."

Ibsen is an author, grower and seller of heirloom tomatoes and organic tomato seed. He also is founder and director of TomatoFest, a fund-raiser conducted each September in Carmel, Calif.

The event includes tomato, wine and olive oil tasting, a salsa showcase, many hard-to-find heirloom tomato seed varieties and some culinary and gardening displays.

"People have different tastes," Ibsen said. "Some people like a big complex fruit that stands up and across country in large lots never being allowed to develop properly.

That's where the heirlooms come in. Each comes with a pedigree. An heirloom tomato is generally defined as any variety grown for generations by a family or a group like the Amish. A variety also may qualify as an heirloom if cultivated at least 50 years.

Heirloom tomatoes grow in colors ranging from deep red to a soft yellow; purple, chocolate, pink, yellow, black and a variegated green, among others. Most have thin skins. Many appear wrinkled and misshapen.

They can be as small as grapes or as large as two-pound sandwich tomatoes, meaning platforms with flesh sliced thick enough to support super-sized hamburgers.

Heirlooms have pleasing personalities. They might not win many beauty contests but they're hard to beat for taste, aroma and texture.

"Home gardeners, grocers — especially small, independently owned — and farmer's markets are all getting used to different looking vegetables with different sounding names. The public is becoming more at home with trying things they've never seen or heard of before," said Barbara Melera, president of the D. Landreth Seed Co., in Baltimore, Md.

"Though there is a growing interest in heirlooms, the real movement is becoming more comfortable with eating new and different things," Melera said.

shouts 'tomato.' (It has) enough acid to push the flavors forward, with just the right amount of sweet for balance and a clean finish. Others may prefer something less robust and more fruity."

Consumers often complain that the tomatoes they buy in supermarkets are attractive but bland — grown in indiscriminate soil, picked green and then shipped
