Leadership class seeking students

Organization recruiting wide range of people interested in helping community

Daily Journal staff report

An organization that provides leadership training and fosters creative community development, problem-solving and involvement is accepting applications for its next class.

Leadership Johnson County is recruiting students for the Class of 2007. A goal of the group is to develop informed and involved individuals who work together to make the community better.

Participants develop their individual leadership style, learn about the social and political issues facing the county, practice community problem solving, and prepare for leadership and trusteeship roles in the community.

A key element of the class is mastering the art of collaboration. The program began in 1995. Classes each year include 23 to 30 members.

Classes are made up of representatives from diverse areas of Johnson County, including business, agriculture, government and social services.

Past participants, including farmers, teachers, bankers, health-care professionals and social workers, have used the class to share ideas and learn about the county.

The monthly meetings, besides offering seminars on leadership and personal and professional development, include discussions on issues important to Johnson County.

For instance, past classes have toured the county's sewage treatment facilities, met educators and elected officials, and learned about taxes and the area's history.

Class members also form teams and engage in projects to help the community.

Any resident of Johnson County may apply to participate

Greenwood will hire a contractor today to continue a $6 million road project in two city subdivisions.

Roadwork in Northern Park and Valle Vista is about halfway complete, and all bids for the next stage of the project were within budget.

Construction is expected to start this spring or summer.

City engineers are recommending for the city board of works to hire Milestone Construction, said Norm Gabehart, city director of operations.

The company's bid was the lowest at about $1.42 million, and four other companies had bids that were slightly higher.
