Golden Globes gowns range from ravishing to ratty

By LAMONT JONES
PITTSBURGH POST-GAZETTE

Red was a popular color among female celebs at Monday's 63rd annual Golden Globes.

Eva Longoria wore it best, the TV housewife was anything but desperate in a stunning Grecian-style frock.

Although the men looked pretty standard in black with some colorful accessories, the women as usual provided the fashion show.

Here's a look at a few other dresses from the awards show that were haute and not.

Haute

Lisa Rinna was sexy and chic in a crystal-detailed white gown with a plunging neckline and tiered train.

She was a total package of loveliness, from hair and makeup to the simple accessory of a single cuff bracelet.

Not

Kyra Sedgwick might have snagged a best actress nomination for her role in the drama series "The Closer," but the closer you got to her dress, the uglier it got.

From the equestrian-esque skinny belts to the frock's shape and generic color, it was one horse blanket that should have been left in the stables.

Haute

Jaime Pressly was a vision in a gold metallic applique strapless gown, which she judiciously topped off with just the right bag and earrings, a pretty off-the-face hairstyle and flawless skin.

Not

Unfortunately, nominee Emmy Rossum showed up at the Golden Globes looking like a pre-ball

Cinderella. She was washed-out in a drab dress that looked like it was made from bordello curtains.

Haute

Kudos to best supporting actress nominee Sandra Oh for covering up where most women dared to flash.

Yet she still cut an elegant figure in a white jewel-embellished dress that showed off toned arms and a dramatic back.

Not

Even Teri Hatcher's killer figure wasn't sufficient to overcome her over-glitzed relic from Vegas.

Too much gold, and too many lines going in too many directions. She looked like a worn-out showgirl.

Duckpin bowling balls are smaller than 10-pin bowling balls. The game can be played at Fountain Square Theatre Building in Indianapolis.

• Retro

Theatre Building houses two duckpin bowling alleys.

Action Bowl on the fourth floor is a restored 1920s alley that sports vintage décor, including bowling memorabilia and a 1918 billiard table, as well as a view of downtown Indianapolis.

Atomic Bowl in the building's lower level is a 1950s-style duckpin alley. It is furnished with 1950s and '60s bowling equipment, and visitors can listen to oldies on the jukebox.

Both lanes begin filling up about 8 p.m. on Fridays and Saturdays.

Before they bowl, the Thompsons like to eat at the Fountain Diner, an original 1950s Woolworth's luncheonette with authentic décor. The hand-dipped shakes and malts from the soda fountain were named best in Indy by Indianapolis Monthly magazine.

On a recent Friday, Tina and Rob Montgomery of Indianapolis were bowling with their three children, Morgan, 2,

Mason, 4, and Regan, 6.

When Mason knocked down a few pins, he raised his arms in victory and yelled, "Three! I got three!"

The couple like duckpin bowling as a family activity because the smaller balls are easier for their children to handle.

The game, which originated on the East Coast in the early 1900s, reached its zenith of popularity in the 1960s, after which participation and interest declined.

The activity gets its name from some duck hunters who thought the smaller pins looked like ducks flying when they went down.

Opinion is mixed on whether the game is easier or harder than 10-pin bowling.

"I think it's harder," said Bart Voigt of Indianapolis, who was trying duckpin bowling for the first time.

Statistics indicate duckpin bowling is more difficult than 10-pin bowling. While perfect games of traditional bowling are scored regularly, no officially sanctioned perfect score of 300 has ever been recorded in duckpin history.

At Fountain Square, the highest men's score is 198, and the highest women's score is 172.
