A CLOSER LOOK: THE JUVENILE SYSTEM

Here's a look at how the justice system works for juvenile suspects:

Detention hearing: A judge will determine if there is enough risk in the case that the teens should be held at the county's juvenile detention center.

The judge is allowed to hold them at the center only if they are considered a threat to themselves or the community or if they're unlikely to appear at subsequent proceedings.

If the children stay at the center:

The court schedules an initial hearing for the teens to hear charges against them, usually within two weeks, Judge Marla Clark said.

If the children are sent home:

The judge can choose to give them no restrictions or put them on informal or electronically monitored house arrest. If teens are detained to begin with, some restrictions are probably appropriate, Clark said.

Parents can say if they are unwilling to take custody of the teens or the teens can say they don't want to go home. Then, the court would have to find a shelter for them. They would probably go to Marion County, since there isn't a shelter in Johnson County.

The initial hearing: After the detention hearing, the case is set for an initial hearing, where the children will be advised of their rights, hear the charges against them and be told all the options the judge has available for sentencing.

The teens can admit to the charges that day, and the judge can choose to sentence the teens that day too. Or the probation officer can ask to put together a predisposition report, and they can set a date for a sentencing hearing another day.

If the teen denies the charges, the case would be set for a fact-finding, the juvenile equivalent of a trial, which is done by the judge. There isn't a jury.

For a case to be waived to adult court:

The county prosecutor must ask that a case be waived, and Clark has to grant the request for the case to be moved.

If the prosecutor decides to ask for this move before the teens' initial hearing, the judge would inform the teens about the request at the hearing, and she would schedule a separate hearing on the matter.

At the waiver hearing, the judge has to consider whether a waiver is appropriate based partly on any pattern of offenses with no realistic possibility of rehabilitation or if the crime is especially heinous.

Parents

children talk to police because they're also concerned about their child's behavior, Franklin Police Chief John Borges said.

Parents can give approval over the phone, but most officers prefer to get written permission when possible, said Lt. Bob Dine, a spokesman for the Greenwood Police Department.

After a child has been taken into police custody, the officer reads the child's rights to both the child and his or her parents.

Then, the parents and child are supposed to be given time to talk before they let police officers know if they are willing to talk to them, Johnson County Prosecutor Lance Hamner said.

Either a parent or the child's lawyer can waive a child's rights before talking to police, Hamner said.

If parents don't give permission, officers said they would keep working on the case, although it likely will take longer to get all the information they need.

A child may still be arrested without talking to police, if police find there's enough evidence to suggest the child has committed a crime, police said.

Children benefit from telling their side of the story, as it may clear their names or stop wrong information from being reported before the case goes to court, Dine said.

Police officers don't need parental approval to interview children who have witnessed an incident, such as a car accident.

But area police said that, even when they're not required to, they let parents know they want to speak to their children as a courtesy.

Teens

the center's director. Police feared the teens could make phone calls to friends who might carry out their plot at the school.

The boys will remain at the detention center indefinitely, unless Johnson County Prosecutor Lance Hamner decides not to file charges. He has until March 13 to make the decision.

The prosecutor will decide what, if any, charges to file and if he will ask that any of the cases be transferred to adult court. The juvenile court judge will decide whether the cases should be tried in adult court.

Whether the teens are tried in juvenile or adult court could have lasting effects on the boys' lives. Juvenile criminal records are wiped clean at the age of 18, but a conviction in adult court could mean longer jail time and possibly a felony record.

Hammer initially planned to file charges Monday and request the cases be moved to adult court. That action was delayed because he is taking more time to sort through investigators' reports and interviews with the teens, he said.

He wants to find out how involved in the plan each of the four was and decide if a move to adult court is appropriate for each teen. So far, the investigation has shown varying levels of involvement for each student, he said.

Hammer wants to find out if all four of the boys viewed the plan as a realistic plot they could carry out or if it was just an idea to talk about. He also will consider whether each boy has a criminal record.

The charge Hamner is considering is conspiracy to commit confinement with a deadly weapon. If convicted, the boys could face up to 20 years in prison.

A decision is expected this week, he said.

The four boys were planning to take control of the school, using at least one gun owned by one of the teens' families, and demand money.

The teens never specified a date but said an ideal situation would be one where a majority of the school was together in one area, such as a pep rally.

Other students were recruited as part of the teens' plan.

The boys were arrested Thursday after two or three girls overheard them talking about their plans and told school officials.

Sheriff's deputies increased their presence in and around all Center Grove schools Friday, but security returned to a normal level on Monday, Assistant Superintendent Julie Koschnick said.

School officials planned to meet after the hearings to determine how much security was needed at the schools today, she said.

Koschnick could not confirm whether the boys had been suspended.

Principal Matt Shockley will decide what disciplinary action the school should take against the boys, such as expulsion. He also could defer that decision to another school administrator, Koschnick said.

Your Dental HEALTH

TOOTH LOSS AND NUTRITION DEFICIT

Tooth loss, especially at the back of the mouth, can make it harder for people to get the nutrients they need to stay vibrant and healthy. According to a recent study, older adults who had fewer than five remaining pairs of back teeth had a lower intake of vitamins A and C and folic acid than those with more intact back teeth. Certainly, this finding is quite understandable when one considers that the molars at the back of the mouth are responsible for chewing food into digestible pieces that the body can further break down and utilize. Of course, one way around the tooth loss/nutrient deficit problem is to eat soft, nutrient-rich foods such as soups and cereals.

A missing tooth leaves a gap in your mouth and room for surrounding teeth to drift out of position and change your bite, potentially leading to serious dental concerns. If you are missing one or more teeth, we encourage you to call CEDAR LANE FAMILY DENTISTRY today to discuss your best options for replacements. Early intervention will help you avoid more extensive and more expensive dentistry in the future. Our entire staff encourages your questions about comprehensive dental care. Call us at 736-7476.
