also make the item from the restaurant the entrée for their lunch and get a fruit or a vegetable too, said Kim Combs, Clark-Pleasant's food service director.

But the decision rests with the students, she said.

"By the time they get to high school, they have to take some responsibility," she said.

Franklin, Edinburg and Nineveh-Hensley-Jackson do not offer any fast food in their cafeterias.

Part of the decision at Franklin is an effort to help kids make better decisions, said Jill Overton, food service director.

Franklin also offers French fries only once a week. Even the chicken patties are baked, not fried.

"You are feeding kids possibly two of their three meals a day," she said.

"We need to take the responsibility to help them make better food choices."

At Center Grove and Clark-Pleasant, the idea for offering fast food didn't come from the food service directors.

A group of Whiteland parents insisted that the cafeteria add the options, Combs said.

"I guess Chick-fil-A once a month isn't going to make or break anyone's healthy lifestyle," she said.

many students said.

Three of the county's six high schools have at least one day a week when a fast-food vendor drops off food students can buy as they move through the lunch line.

Amid concern about increases in childhood obesity, health experts, lawmakers and some parent groups around the nation are paying more attention to what kids eat at school.

Local food service directors also have to analyze their menus this year to comply with a mandate to draft a school wellness policy by July 1.

Menus must contain only so much fat and provide healthy options to students.

Food service directors are making adjustments in menus.

But the message they get from their students is clear: Don't take away our fast food.

No matter how many veggies or fruits are offered, students vote with their wallets — or at least their lunch identification cards — every day.

dors are by far the most popular choices students make, said Mary Ellen Sheehan, Center Grove food service director.

"The kids really enjoy it and appreciate it," Sheehan said. "Students are so used to going to the mall and eating, and that's what they get (to eat) at the mall."

Whiteland and Greenwood high schools also offer fast-food options in their cafeterias.

At Whiteland, Chick-fil-A brings chicken sandwiches once a month.

Arby's brings in roast beef sandwiches once a month, and Domino's pizza is served every Tuesday.

Greenwood offers Arby's on Mondays and Domino's on Thursdays.

Some local schools have modified what the fast-food restaurants bring to the school.

At Center Grove, the sandwiches are served on a whole wheat bun. And for Arby sandwiches: hold the cheese sauce.

Sheehan orders ham pizzas instead of pepperoni because ham has less fat.

Soon, though, Domino's will bring over pizzas with a new low-fat version of the pepperoni.

Efforts to bring in veggie pizzas look grim. Sheehan conducted a taste test with a group of students.

"They told me that no one would eat it," she said.

At Greenwood Community High School, vegetarian options have been introduced, said Todd Garrison, assistant principal.

Students can get a veggie burger or a yogurt with fruit nearly every day.

But despite the healthy choices offered to students, pizza remains pretty popular, he said.

High schools also offer other entrees on the days fast food is served.

At Whiteland, students can

"If you see an ash tree with little flecks of bark missing, that's a sign the tree is infected."

Bob Waltz
Indiana's state entomologist, on infestations of emerald ash borers

Trees

15 million ash trees in three states since being discovered in southeast Michigan in 2002.

More than 100,000 ash trees have been cut and burned in Indiana since April 2004, when the beetle was first spotted in the state at a campground north of Fort Wayne.

But beetle discovery in Carmel last week was out of place and shows that the insect may have been here for seven years, before anyone in the United States knew it existed, the state's top bug expert said.

"We just can't determine where it is in the state," said Indiana entomologist Bob Waltz.

"We don't know how far out it's gone."

A main reason for the quick spread is that infested firewood is moved into new areas and transported to new ash trees, Waltz said.

The small, metallic green insect attacks ash trees by feeding on leaves and bark, clogging the vessels that channel water and nutrients from the roots to the tree crown.

"The tree basically starves to death," Waltz said. "If you see an ash tree with little flecks of bark missing, that's a sign the tree is infested."

The marks are made by woodpeckers, which hear the beetles inside the tree and go after them with their beaks, he said.

People can also look for D-shaped holes in the bark, where the beetles emerge from the tree, Waltz said.

Once a tree is infested, there is nothing anyone can do to save the tree, he said.

The state's policy had been to cut down every ash tree within a half-mile radius of an infestation. But now only infested or dangerously damaged trees will be cut, Waltz said.

Tree services charge from $50 to more than $1,000 to remove larger trees, White said.

He said the best method to protect trees is to water them at least once a month, since ash borers are more attracted to weakened ashes.

WHAT A BORE

Indiana's population of ash trees are in danger of being wiped out by an exotic beetle that experts believe was unknowingly transported to North America on freight ships from China and Korea in the mid-1990s. The emerald ash borer first appeared in southeastern Michigan in July 2002 and spread throughout the state and into Canada and Ohio before entering Indiana in 2004. Ash trees in Carmel are the most recent victims, but the state's estimated 147 million ash trees are in danger.

Snapshot of the beetle

The emerald ash borer is a bright, metallic, coppery-green insect that is about a third of an inch long. Adults are difficult to spot in trees and are only visible between mid-May and late-July, when they lay eggs and nest inside trees until the following spring. During cooler months, the beetle larvae are creamy white and can be found underneath the bark.

What it does

The borer destroys ash trees by feeding on the leaves and bark, which clogs the vessels that channel water and nutrients from the roots to the tree crown. Ash trees can be identified by feathery leaves that have five to nine leaflets, and branches that are opposite to each other.

What can you do to help?

- Do not transport ash firewood from outside of the area.
- Keep trees watered during the summer. Fertilize trees to keep them healthier and make them less attractive to the ash borers, which prefer stressed trees.

How can you recognize infestation?

Property owners can identify infested trees by looking for:

- Signs that the tree's crown is thinning out
- Woodpecker damage in upper branches
- Open cracks on the trunk or main branches where bark is drying out
- D-shaped holes on parts of the bark where the bugs exit the tree

What to do if you suspect infestation

- You do not have to cut the tree down, but you may need to at a later time.
- If the tree is large, call an arborist to cut the tree down. Cost varies from $50 to more than $1,000.
- Call the Indiana Department of Natural Resources at 232-4120.
- If you can, capture one of the insects. Put it in a plastic jar and place it in the freezer to kill it, then wrap it and send to either the Indiana Department of Natural Resources, Division of Entomology and Plant Pathology, 402 W. Washington St., Room W290, Indianapolis, IN 46204; or the Plant and Pest Diagnostic Lab, Purdue University, 1155 LSPS, W. Lafayette, IN 47907
