Film about hip-hop from former fan

you don't have to love or even hate hip-hop music to find the "Independent Lens" (10 p.m., WFYI, WTIU) documentary "Hip Hop: Beyond the Beats and Rhymes" thoughtprovoking.

A self-proclaimed hip-hop head, filmmaker Byron Hurt began to think about the music's messages when he was hired as a youth counselor by Northeastern University.

He began to question the music's prevailing themes of extreme violence between black men and its dismissive, insulting portrayal of black women.

While many conversations about hip-hop revolve around race, this film discusses changing attitudes toward masculinity that transcend skin color.

Hip-hop has emerged over the past three decades, a time that has also seen the rise of extremely violent movies and video games and the era of the exaggerated male physiques exhibited by actors like Sylvester Stallone and Arnold Schwarzenegger, steroid-enhanced athletes and nearly every professional wrestler.

As many here observe, these trends point not to macho swagger but to a culture of extreme male insecurity.

Hurt presents interviews with rappers Mos Def, Fat Joe, Chuck D. Jadakiss and Busta Rhymes, as well as dozens of would-be performers at hip-hop conventions and gatherings.

Many artists and amateur rappers agree that the hard look and attitude of many stars is only a pose. And some contend that the thuggish facade offered by 50 Cent and others is not from the street but driven by corporate suits.

The film notes that consciousness-raising music of groups like Public Enemy vanished right after most record labels were consolidated into just a few corporations. And the rise of radio giants like Clear Channel have only accelerated the trend toward hateful and banal themes of booty, bling and thug culture.

Hurt and others describe an ugly preconceived image of blackness fabricated for a hiphop audience that is more than 70 percent white and distributed by a music and radio industry dominated by white executives.

Smith ioins ranks of Playmates dead before 50

The selection of Anna Nicole Smith as a Playboy Playmate in 1992 made her a member of an exclusive sorority. Her death at 39 put her in a more grisly club: Playmates who haven't reached their 50th birthday. Automobile of Playmates. The cause of Smith's death is still unclear. "It's sad how many girls we've lost," said Peter Gowland, who photographed a number of centerfolds for Playboy in the 1950s and '60s with the help of his wife. In 1968, Gowland photographed Paige Young. In 1974, she was dead of a drug overdose. Jayne Mansfield, another Playmate he photographed, died in a car crash in 1967 at 34.

More than 600 women have graced Playboy's centerfold since the magazine began publishing in the 1950s. Their lives after the magazine have been both in and out of the spotlight, but their limited number and Playboy's wide circulation has meant that the death of one can become bombshell news.

Perhaps before Smith, the most headline-grabbing death of a Playmate was that of 20-yearold Dorothy Stratten.

Just months after she became the magazine's Playmate of the Year in 1980, she was murdered by her jealous estranged husband.

Playboy founder Hugh Hefner has said he and others never really got over Stratten's death. The magazine ran a tribute to her life.

Jennifer Love Hewitt plays Melinda Gordon, an antique-shop owner who talks to spirits, on "Ghost Whisperer."

derful person. Good night." Identifying with the characters she plays is Hewitt's style.

When I interviewed her seven years ago, she called Sarah Reeves someone who "has always been my best friend. I started playing her when I was 16, and everything that she's gone through, I've gone through."

Sarah, of course, was teenager

Daniel S. Martin

Bailey's girlfriend on the Fox drama "Party of Five" who, in 1999, fled San Francisco for New York in search of her father on a spinoff created especially for Hewitt.

But "Time of Your Life" would be a single-season flop. And for Hewitt, whose professional debut had been at age 10 on the Disney Channel series "Kids Incorporated," her bid to clinch adulthood in the character of Sarah was cut short prematurely. The specter loomed of Hewitt, then 21, as a teen ingenue past her prime, a fresh-faced siren with a celebrated figure who wasn't taken seriously as a grown-up. "I hope that I'll be able to make the full transition into adult roles," she told me at the time, and indeed, she was already set to portray her idol, Audrey Hepburn, in an ambitious biopic she was producing for ABC.

After that, she appeared in a variety of features and TV films, including "The Tuxedo" (an action-comedy with Jackie Chan), "Confessions of a Sociopathic Social Climber" (as the title character) and the two animated "Garfield" movies.

For Hewitt, whose 28th birthday is next week, crossing over was something she always meant to do "in a smart way, the right way for me, gracefully. "Actors have done it lots of different ways," she points out. "They'll play a drug addict and completely change their image.

"Or they'll go and take off all their clothes and be like, 'Ohhh, I'm a woman!" She chuckles. "That's an approach, absolutely."

Did she get offers to take her clothes off? "I got lots of those," she says with a smile. "But I can't. It's just not me." It happens that Hewitt's good-girl sheen makes her all the more impressive as a leading lady in the tank tops, nighties, sun-dresses and other cleavagefriendly garb her character displays.

"It's eye candy for the audience," Hewitt readily admits, "and I'm comfortable with that. And if I'm gonna go and wear a small top, let me play a character who's also got a lot of integrity and is very smart, and sincere and empathetic, so that viewers are seeing that, too."
