Enrollment at Duke not hurt by case

The Associated Press

The lacrosse sexual offense case doesn't seem to have had a serious effect on the number of high school students applying to Duke University.

Nearly 18,500 students applied for 1,665 places for the fall, second only to last year's record of 19,387, Duke officials announced Tuesday.

"I was less certain about where exactly we'd end up this year" given the circumstances, said Christoph Guttentag, dean of undergraduate admissions. "I think that the change this year is very much within the context of what we see from year to year."

Spring classes resumed Wednesday at Duke, and much has changed in the criminal case against three lacrosse players since students and faculty left for winter break last month.

Rape charges against the players were dropped after the woman who said she was attacked at a team party in March wavered on some key details.

Then the Durham County (N.C.) prosecutor was charged with ethics violations, and a group of district attorneys in North Carolina urged him to recuse himself from the divisive case.

University officials last week invited two of the players, Collin Finnerty and Reade Seligmann, to return to the Durham campus as students in good standing. The third lacrosse player, Dave Evans, graduated in May.
